REBRANDING AN ICON: THE CLASSIC
AMERICAN GIRL LOOK

A Note from the Editor

If you're like me, you spend as much time in the world of dolls as you possibly can. You buy them, you collect them, you dress them, you pose them, you just plain love them. And who can blame you? Because let's face it, the world of dolls is a lot more fun and interesting than most of the crazy "real" world. So welcome to the second issue of Doll Digest, where every quarter, we bring you everything you want to—everything you need to know—about dolls.

We start this issue with a visit to the amazing Pasha Setrova of Pasha Pasha, who creates the ball-jointed dolls that are all the talk of the doll community. Meet the inventor and designer of what many are calling the most highly-engineered dolls around.

Then join us on a sojourn down memory lane as we explore the debut—in 1959—of the very first Barbie doll, at New York's American Toy Fair. Dwight Eisenhower was president and eggs were 53 cents a dozen!

From there we take a look at the rebranding of a classic, the American Girl Doll. New typography, a new color palette, and a new positioning statement are among the exciting latest developments in the latest touches added to this icon of doll world.

And finally, we consider the impact on dolls of the latest technology—specifically, how the manufacturers of Smart Doll Cortex 2 have made it possible to equip her with an AI Conversational module that allows her to speak both English and Chinese! Amazing!

So get dolled up, friends, and join us for another fun-packed issue of Doll Digest!

Traversing the uncanny valley with Pasha Setrova of Pasha Pasha, a preeminent designer of the ball-jointed doll community

She is long-limbed and fully articulated, with a high, round forehead, sculpturally carved cheeks, and pouting, breathless lips. Her eyes: blue, framed by impossibly long, soft lashes and set under a prominent brow. She is wearing a crown of icy blue lace. When I arrive at the Pasha Pasha studio in Harlem, she is in the midst of an Alice in Wonderland-themed photoshoot: Rococo set dressing abundant, ring lights trained.

She is 54 centimeters tall, and she is a doll.

“She is heavy, like stone,” said Pasha Setrova as she passed Alice (full name: Alice of Royal Blessings) to me, bedecked in an elaborate satin ensemble, complete with a surgical mask, a cape, and thigh-high boots. “Even when you touch it, it’s soft as marble.”

Setrova is a doll designer—one of the best within the small but intense world of ball-jointed doll (BJD) collectors and creators: an obscure faction of people who have kept loving dolls far outside the bounds of childhood. Though the defining feature of a BJD is its joints—a feature now found on newer generations of Barbie and other dolls and action figures—a true BJD is elevated by craft, made in small batches and customized to perfection. Their faces and bodies are beguiling, having stretched the definition of humanoid into all of its potential, fantastic manifestations.

As Pasha Pasha, Setrova, her two assistants, and her wife and business partner Erika Liu create what are thought to be some of the most highly engineered dolls on the scene. Setrova demonstrates Alice's malleability, detaching her hand from her forearm. "It's a magnet, it will go back."

Setrova's dolls boast 33 moveable parts, including a complex shoulder joint that Setrova herself invented, and is constantly, obsessively improving upon. This mad engineer, who started modeling at the tender age of 15 in her native Russia, wanted her dolls to move like she could—arching the neck, pushing the ball of the shoulder forward, curving the torso in on itself. I look at Setrova's assistant, stringing a doll.

Alice, and I look at Setrova, and I notice they have the same witchy hands, the same flared eyes—though Alice's hair is white, and Setrova's is pink, and while Setrova is slim, Alice and her doll kin are skeletal.

Blanks (unpainted dolls) are lined up on trays—naked, missing parts. They live in the atelier proper, a room separate from the photo room. Set against the clutter of the studio—littered with fabric, sewing machines, paint brushes, and glue guns—the dolls await their eyes and the inset of the four little teeth, visible through their parted lips. The two assistants—like dour elves in Santa's slightly fucked up workshop—work at them, one painting a face, the other constructing a wig.

When fully dressed, the dolls gesture at modellesque proportions: Bare, they are something extreme. They are very long, the torso is made in four parts, recalling the anatomy of Avatar's Na'vi. The thighs are more femur than thigh. The sheath of her back is pinched up in the middle: her knobbly spine.

But then there is genitalia. Back to reality. Though Greta Gerwig's Barbie may profess, "I do not have a vagina and [Ken] does not have a penis," Setrova's dolls, if brought to life, would make no such claims. And might appreciate, moreover, the thought put into the delicate curls of pubic hair attached down there, dyed to match hair color, or in certain cases, outfit.

I've spent a lot of time looking at Setrova's dolls, both online and in person. They are truly bewitching, both beautiful, and other. Yet there's a feeling of unease—I'm supposed to find a doll like that suspicious.

"In the end, dolls are still representational, but not necessarily aspirational."

Of course, there was my 2010s Tumblr training. Post-Y2K, pre-Barbie movie, the Mattel doll found herself at the frontier of debates over representation, which, given her origin story, isn't at all surprising. The story goes that she was designed to replace the baby doll, allowing the girl child to stop seeing herself as a future mother and instead, as a future young lady. But that waist! I recall seeing some graphic about all the brutal ways Barbie’s body would malfunction if, indeed, she found herself no longer made of plastic but of meat—organs not fitting, and such. By putting Barbie in the hands of girls, we’ve set them onto a path of self-destruction, telling them to model their bodies against a physically impossible ideal.

But for an adult who collects, plays with, and perhaps centers their craft on their dolls, the issue of representation should be resolved, because the on us of protecting impressionable minds is removed. Yet adults who play with dolls, and dolls themselves, so often provoke a negative reaction. Even in adulthood, it seems, many of us still don’t trust what it is that dolls represent and what they might mean to us.

Upstairs—past the studio door with its fingerprint-encoded biometric locks—is Setrova and Liu’s apartment. It is appropriately whimsical:

red walls; portraits in gold-painted frames; two beautiful, snub-nosed cats, one of which curls up on a decorative porcelain dish in the middle of the table once we sit down.

Her clients (the likes of whom include Guillermo del Toro) are mostly women and gay men. One collector told me most people in the community area—“not neurotypical.” But aside from all having probably liked dolls or action figures as a kid, there’s no one type of collector, and there’s no one way to interact with one’s doll.

Some people open the box, and then close it again, only taking them out to brush their hair. There must be other private gestures—gazing and holding, I suppose. But the most common (or at least discernable) pastime for doll collectors is to take pictures of them, in either static shots or image series that unfold narratives. This is partially why Pasha Pasha dolls are in such high demand: Their exceptional mobility opens up a range of naturalistic poses.

There are many collectors who become creators. If not of the dolls themselves, they might become specialists in the careful art of painting body blush and makeup, or else become amateur wigmakers, or miniature clothing designers. One doll might bear the mark of four or more different creators, from her custom resin eyeballs to her 3D printed shoes—barter, trades, and sales abound.

“You don’t need to catfish anybody, this is your avatar,” said Setrova. “There are so many of these accounts of people’s dolls and you look at them and get this impression of a person: ‘Oh, isn’t she so stylish, isn’t that such cool makeup.’”

Tastes, of course, diverge. What Setrova doesn’t quite understand is the collector who dresses their doll in sweatpants, and sets them up in a scene with a computer and a cup of coffee. Her own vision as an artist is maximalist, with collections featuring tributes to Iris van Herpen and Vivienne Westwood, and accessories which have no human counterpart: fetishwear that holds a unicorn doll's horn and ears in place; a complicated piece of lingerie that is part lederhosen, part panty, part dick sheath.

There was a time when I craved the luxuriously simple beauty of the messy bun, of looking casually perfect in leisurewear. It might be as cathartic to achieve that aesthetic for one's doll as it is satisfying to pull off an uber-complicated Victorian get-up, corset handmade and miniaturized.

And lest you think everyone is cooking up their own unique trends, Setrova has noticed that the qualities that people like in their dolls, both physical and aesthetic, tend to follow broad regional patterns.

"Russians like super skinny girls—whimsical, but skinny," said Setrova. "Americans like chubby children, mostly children with big eyes. [In] France, they like the monster-esque, mermaids or little dragons with little horns. [In] Japan, Korea, it's very anime, with those ruched dresses."

In the end, dolls are still representational, but not necessarily aspirational. They are small portals to the unified aesthetic worlds that we can tap into via our imaginations, and hunt for in music, books, movies, and art. It's true that the worlds BJD dolls bring us closer to are not commonly articulated in quotidian media, whether it is the gothic, erotic, razor-sharp beauty of Setrova's dolls, or the cutesy, stub-legged children of DoDollsDream. These are hyper-specific trends that express notions of age, gender, style, and erotics that we're not primed to deal with.

"People will say, 'Oh, that's creepy,' when they see my dolls, and then I'll just say, 'You're not invited back to my house,'" said Allison Hernandez, a BJD collector with a YouTube channel where she talks about dolls and interviews people in the community in her deep South Carolina accent.

"I hate to be that way, but it's such a big part of my life. I'd never go to someone's house and say that something they love or are passionate about is creepy."

Fortunately, Hernandez's family has always been supportive of her love of dolls, as have the people at her corporate job, and her husband, who collects vinyl records. "[My coworkers] say I've got the most interesting Zoom background in the company." She goes to a collectors meet-up for doll people in the Carolinas twice a year, chairs a doll convention, and has a good friend just 10 minutes away from her who also collects.

Not everyone is so lucky. One of the messages Hernandez receives most from her followers are those asking how she managed to find people who could accept her interest in dolls.

"They'll ask me how I can be so confident, how I'm not embarrassed," said Hernandez. "I always tell people, just be confident with it. Don't hide it. If you act like there's something wrong with it, and you're hiding it away from people, then they're gonna think there's something wrong with it."

There is a sad flinch that comes each time I speak with a BJD collector, a moment of acknowledging and remembering moments of intense rejection, disgust, or plain teasing. In taking a casual survey about what it is, exactly, that my peers found so disturbing about dolls, the uncanny valley was often provided as an answer.

The uncanny valley is an inverse bell curve. On the high points of the hills reside, to the left, non-human things that look non-human that we like—stuffed animals, a cartoon of a person. On the other hill reside the humans who look human. Those objects that look human, but are not quite—a prosthetic hand, silicon over a robot face—define the valley between. IRL, the closest thing to looking human but not quite is a dead body. So there is corpse fear, pathogen avoidance: I'm not quite convinced that's what provokes the shudder for the BJDs and its attendant community.

Another answer might be found in our response to object fetish, which, again, seemed a popular theory. And there is something to it, insofar as we look at the history of the ball-jointed doll. Modern BJD are believed to have originated in Asia, but Setrova postulates that they entered the European imagination with the German artist Hans Bellmer, who became famous for the large, ball jointed dolls he created for his surreal, sexual, sculptural works. Bellmer, in turn, was inspired by the 16th century wooden articulated dolls in the collection of Berlin's Kaiser Friedrich Museum (now known as the Bode Museum).

The one articulated doll from this era that I was able to find in Bode's “They’ll ask me how I can be so confident, how I’m not embarrassed,” said Hernandez.

“I always tell people, just be confident with it. Don’t hide it. If you act like there’s something wrong with it, and you’re hiding it away from people, then they’re gonna think there’s something wrong with it.”

collection is “Female jointed doll, Nuremberg c. 1520.” Carved out of boxwood, an unknown craftsman created her out of a stunning 57 parts crammed gracefully into 22 centimeters of height. Like modern BJDs, the parts are held together with internal elastic string, though in this antique case, the string is made of sheep gut. The craftsman carved her a bonnet but no other clothing; her pubic hair is intricate; and she sports a sweet, contented smile.

As mentioned in an article published in the Berliner Morgenpost, because the doll was too finely crafted to have been made as a typical artist’s model, and too naked to have been intended for children, the object should be considered a work of art—even if it’s advanced articulation encouraged interaction. Yet, when interaction is offered, some of us play a little too hard. At some point in the doll’s provenance, someone hollowed out her genitalia, and painted the area red, prompting the writer to ask if this object could be considered Berlin’s first sex doll.

What to do with our urges? And first, to be clear, not every doll collector has an erotic relationship with their doll, but most of us did as children. Our parents looked askance when we made our dolls fuck, as sly as we thought we might’ve been when enacting these moments of aggression, confusion, and lust. At some point, we either have to curb our impulses or unleash them onto others. The consensus is that children should be allowed symbols of their futures or their fantasies, but at a certain age, these proxies signal maladjustment. The feeling is that at best, a doll should be an art object one collects at remove, and the relationship should go no further.

I might feel the same way if I hadn’t met Rush.

Rush describes himself as the only man in the Bronx who owns a BJD, maybe the only straight man who owns a doll in this entire city. He knows two men who own Pasha Pasha dolls—one in Manhattan, one in Brooklyn—and they’re both gay. The rest of the Pasha Pasha collectors he knows of are women. It kind of happened by accident.

"I didn't know I was in a community until I was knee-deep in it," said Rush. He's a fit Black man who looks 35 at most but is in fact, in his 50s. He's wearing black-rimmed glasses and sports a goatee that ends in a long twist.

More than five years ago, Rush had spied the very first Pasha Pasha prototypes online. They were bare, unpainted, and unclothed, but full of those amazing joints. A cartoonist and illustrator, Rush figured that what he was seeing was some highly advanced version of the wooden artist's model. As he tracked Setrova's development of the doll, he came to know what it was, and bought one anyway. Now he has seven.

"I'm not a collector, seven is enough for me," said Rush. "When I bought that first doll, I said, Okay, I'm gonna use this doll for art, case closed. Then I started learning about who makes the best pants and who does the best face-ups. Through the community, I've learned to expand my own creativity by doing the wigs, the face-ups myself."

Aware that he's a rare breed, Rush has a clear idea of what brought him to where he is today. As a kid, he loved GI Joe, who, unlike Barbie, possessed a great deal of articulation—the neck could swivel 360 degrees, and so on.

"Since I'm a man now, I'm less interested in being a soldier and more interested in being a boyfriend," said Rush, hence the switch from GI Joe to Pasha Pasha.

Rush describes himself as a dude's dude: "I'm a beer and football, punch my buddy in the shoulder kinda guy." And yet, he appreciates the opportunity his dolls give him to be closer to the feminine.

-“As he describes it to me, the doll is a “perfect taco” that you can season just as you’d like.”-

Pasha Pasha wDoll

"Femininity, it's attractive to me. I like the whole high heels thing, the dresses, and the makeup," said Rush. "I found dolls [were] a safe way to explore that, to feel creative with that. It's a way to be controlling without being possessive. And who doesn't love waking up to a few beautiful women every morning?"

As he describes it to me, the doll is a "perfect taco" that you can season just as you'd like. Whether they're representations of the self, projections of fantasy, or verging on the parasocial, the concentration of aesthetics coupled with the ability to focus one's tastes on a single object is a powerful sensation. But it is just this height of manifested desire that, I think, triggers an ick for the image of the dolls and the people who like them.

I can spend all day on Instagram looking at these beguiling dolls and only feel further pulled in by the strange artistry of them, even begin to covet them. But it's when a collector posts a picture of their doll in human context, their bedroom, say, lined up with other dolls, or at a convention center, that I get this profound feeling of the object—the distance between fantasy and reality is overwhelmingly stark. I cringe.

But why? We live in a society in which projections of fantasy and aspiration rule social economies, both on and outside the internet. There is not all that much separating the influencer, their persona, the shilled content, the pretend candid view of their life (which is mostly made of hours of setting up tripods in solitude) and the doll. What is the internet but a drip of softcore erotica: workout videos, Twitch streaming in push-up bras, and OOTDs—13-year-old girls and grown men abound, watching. Projecting, aspiring, admiring, something unified. God forbid we acknowledge the artifice, take it into our hands, and face the impossible beauty we crave.

What does Rush love about his dolls? "I can get as close as I want."

THE BARBIE DOLL MAKES ITS DEBUT

History.com Editors

On March 9, 1959, the first Barbie doll goes on display at the American Toy Fair in New York City.

Eleven inches tall, with a waterfall of blond hair, Barbie was the first mass-produced toy doll in the United States with adult features. The woman behind Barbie was Ruth Handler, who co-founded Mattel, Inc. with her husband in 1945. After seeing her young daughter ignore her baby dolls to play make-believe with paper dolls of adult women, Handler realized there was an important niche in the market for a toy that allowed little girls to imagine the future.

Barbie's appearance was modeled on a doll named Lilli, based on a German comic strip character. Originally marketed as a racy gag gift to adult men in tobacco shops, the Lilli doll later became extremely popular with children. Mattel bought the rights to Lilli and made its own version, which Handler named after her daughter, Barbara. With its sponsorship of the “Mickey Mouse Club” TV program in 1955, Mattel became one of the first toy companies to broadcast commercials to children. They used this medium to promote their new toy, and by 1961, the enormous consumer demand for the doll led Mattel to release a boyfriend for Barbie. Handler named him Ken, after her son. Barbie’s best friend, Midge, came out in 1963; her little sister, Skipper, debuted the following year.

Over the years, Barbie generated huge sales—and a lot of controversy. On the positive side, many women saw Barbie as providing an alternative to traditional 1950s gender roles. She has had a series of different jobs, from airline stewardess, doctor, pilot and astronaut to Olympic athlete and even U.S. presidential candidate. Others thought Barbie’s never-ending supply of designer outfits, cars and “Dream Houses” encouraged kids to be materialistic. It was Barbie’s appearance that caused the most controversy, however. Her tiny waist and enormous breasts—it was estimated that if she were a real woman, her measurements would be 36-18-38—led many to claim that Barbie provided little girls with an unrealistic and harmful example and fostered negative body image.

Despite the criticism, sales of Barbie-related merchandise continued to soar, topping 1 billion dollars annually by 1993. Since 1959, more than one billion dolls in the Barbie family have been sold around the world and Barbie is now a bona fide global icon.

REBRANDING AN ICON: THE CLASSIC AMERICAN GIRL LOOK GETS A FRESH SPIN

By Charlotte Beach

For 90s kids like myself, few moments throughout the year were as exciting as when the American Girl doll arrived in the mailbox. I remember devouring every issue from cover to cover on our family couch, mentally noting the latest accessories I needed for my Molly doll and coveting the matching outfits the smiling little girls on the pages donned with their doll sidekicks.

Having an American Girl doll at that age was not only the ultimate social cachet and right of passage into girl-dom, but the specific doll you chose spoke volumes about who you were as a person, your values, your personality, and even your identity. That might sound dramatic, but believe me, those were the stakes. To this day, instead of asking someone the classic cultural question of which Sex and the City character they identify as, I find it more telling to ask what American Girl doll they owned.

While my American Girl dolls are long stashed in my parents' attic, American Girl remains a central touchstone in our culture, evolving with the modern child and continuing to stay current. They've recently undergone a brand refresh to maintain this status, enlisting the pros at Pentagram for the project. "The American Girl brand needed a relevant refresh to better connect with millennial moms and today's core consumer," shared Kristina Duncan, Vice President-Creative for American Girl.

"The rebrand needed to be an evolution versus a revolution. We needed a modern interpretation that would stir a nostalgic response. One that would both celebrate our rich history and retain our valuable equity while also shining a light on the bright future of the brand."

Led by Partner Emily Oberman, the Pentagram team addressed this brief head-on, ushering in a fresh look and feel for the beloved brand while retaining what OG AG fans like me fell in love with in the first place.

Americ

New American Girl Doll Logo Mocked up on a building.

an Girl

When American Girl approached you and your team, what was the brief for this project?

A few things made this a great moment for American Girl.

The client wanted something that modernized American Girl without having it lose its soul—in fact, they wanted to bring more of its soul back into the brand. They knew that many of the girls who grew up with American Girl were parents now, so they wanted to appeal to both audiences in an authentic way. At the heart of that is storytelling and the genuine love that the American Girl has for finding uniqueness in every girl and every story. They also wanted the brand and the way you experience the brand to be as premium as the dolls and all their accessories.

What was it like to helm the rebrand of such a beloved cultural icon?

It was amazing. When we got the call, a primal scream went through the office. My team is filled with genuine American Girl fans, so it was easy to dive into the heart of what made them so wonderful. I am a little older than the people who grew up playing with the dolls, so I got to fall in love with them and understand what makes them so special. (Again, it's the storytelling and how that fuels imagination.) The American Girl team also loves this brand, so it was great to collaborate with them. They just needed someone from the outside to help them see where to focus.

What was the thought process behind the typography you landed on?

Nobody wanted to change the brand so much that it didn't feel like American Girl anymore. We had to retain the spirit of the original ethos, but we wanted something unique and a little sharper to reflect the star that has always been an icon for AG. We worked with Commercial Type to evolve their typeface Feature Display into Pleasant Serif (named after AG founder Pleasant Rowland) to have an 18-degree angle to reflect the new angle for the star (which is a nod to the 18-inch height of the dolls—a super nerdy easter egg, I know). It's meant to be friendly and sharp, like every American Girl fan!

My favorite thing is that the two i's in the logo are different sizes to represent a girl and her doll (another easter egg).

Group of young girls and a doll!

What was the process behind the color palette you developed?

Once again, we started with the heritage. They already had a main color, “Berry,” but we noticed it was a little muted and not consistent across all media, or even all printed media. So, we brightened it a little and made it richer and uniform across all media. We consider it to be AG’s version of Tiffany Blue. Then we expanded Berry into what we call the “Berry Patch,” which is variations on that color that we could use to create historical patterns and prints that instantly felt classic and modern at the same time. We also pulled the bright poppy colors from the 90s palette to allow for a broader range of colors that didn’t feel too saccharine, which AG has never been.

What aspect of this project are you proudest of?

We were able to tap into “the exceptional story of girlhood”—the positioning statement we created for American Girl—and really capture the energy, creativity, and intelligence that this brand and these dolls have always meant to inspire. The statement applies to all girls, women, those who identify as women, and anyone who identifies as an American Girl fan of any gender.

Because we really understood the mission of American Girl, we were able to convey that through the design of everything. I hope the joy and thoughtfulness comes through to everyone who interacts with it.

Which American Girl Doll do you identify with the most?

Probably Julie. She is a child of the 70s. She is a feminist. She speaks out against sexism and racism. She is not afraid to speak her mind in general. She also has very cool mod furniture—I have her tiny lava lamp in my living room. I’m not so good at basketball though. Julie, Samantha, and Addy sit in my team room.

She's an American Girl
just like YOU!

SMART DOLL CORTEX 2

By Danny Choo

Smart Doll Cortex 2 can now be equipped with an AI conversational #M5Stack module, allowing them to speak both English and Chinese. Thanks to their magnetic modular design, all components fit seamlessly inside the body—something not possible with the vinyl version. This Xiao Zhi powered model also features an optional screen that displays readable replies and emoji-based expressions, enhancing interactions with visual feedback.

Smart Doll's quirky responses to misheard inputs often lead to unexpected lols. At first, their replies are unpredictable, adding to their charm and making conversations feel organic and fun. However, they become more accurate over time as they learn from interactions.

The AI models powering Smart Doll are trained in Natural Language Understanding, enabling them to grasp context, intent, and nuances in user input for more meaningful responses. They also support context retention across multiple conversation turns, allowing for smooth and continuous dialogue. They adapt and refine their responses as they engage in more conversations, making interactions feel increasingly natural and personalized.

We will provide tutorials and 3d printing files so folks can build their modules and install AI models such as ChatGPT, DeepSeek, Qwen2.5 72B, etc. This way, owners can tweak their Smart Doll's voice, accent, and personality to reflect their creativity, ideals, and identity.

With the advancement of open-source offline LLMs, local processing ensures your Smart Doll can safeguard the secrets you share—keeping them safe from Skynet.

We are also working on integrating robotics and hardware control to broaden the application of #smartdoll as a truly useful companion (instead of just sitting around asking you for more apparel) that can interact with their environment, assist with everyday tasks, and adapt to their owner's needs—whether that means offering companionship, controlling smart home devices, or even detecting environmental changes for safety.

If you're Team John Connor, no worries! AI components are entirely optional—whether you choose to go DIY or skip them altogether, the decision is yours. At least until Skynet has other plans.
